A 16-year-old male presented with a severe hemorrhagic varicella that resulted in an acquired hemophilia. Within 24 hours of onset of the disease a severe hemophilic thrombocytopenia developed which was rapidly complicated by multiple cerebral infarctions. Following a cytoreductive treatment with cytostatic steroids, the course of the disease was followed by serial measurements of von Willebrand factor activity, FVIII antigen, and FVIII ristocetin cofactor assay. A severe pathological decrease in FVIII antigen was documented repeatedly, concomitantly with the absence of FVIII activity. This patient is presented to emphasize the different clinical courses during the course of the varicella infection: severe thrombocytopenia rapidly progressing to intravascular coagulopathy and cerebral infarction vs a mild course with no thrombocytopenia, a transient increase in FVIII antigen, but a rapid decrease in FVIII activity and bleeding without thrombocytopenia. We suggest, that acquired hemophilia in childhood patients is not a rare phenomenon. The prognosis of varicella-induced acquired hemophilia is determined by the intensity of the clinical course of the varice

Single-dose pharmacokinetic interactions between human immunodeficiency virus protease inhibitors and antiretrovirals. Human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection is characterized by dynamic immune and viral changes that drive the ever-evolving adaptations of the virus and its host. The primary treatment for HIV-infected individuals is the combination of four different classes of antiretrovirals (ARVs): nucleoside reverse transcriptase inhibitors (NRTIs), non-nucleoside reverse transcriptase inhibitors (NNRTIs), protease inhibitors (PIs) and integrase inhibitors (INIs). The subsequent use of monotherapy to treat HIV-infected patients may be limited by the emergence of drug resistance that contributes to virologic failure in some cases. Single-dose pharmacokinetic (PK) evaluations of PIs in combination with NRTIs, NNRTIs and INIs can be used in humans to define the additive or synergistic, yet potentially different, effects of these agents on the PK of the other agents and to facilitate the development of effective single-agent strategies. The potential benefits of single-dose PK evaluations for PIs include the potential for therapeutic optimization of dosing. It is likely that single-dose PK evaluations will become standard practice in many, if not most, NRTI-, NNRTI- and INI-based ARV regimens
